We're featuring millions of their reader ratings on our book pages to help you find your new favourite book. The chapters on "smart mobility" and "reinventing neighbourhoods", with their in-depth coverage of Swedish and Danish urban planning and transport approaches were my favourites, and quite inspiring. Austin Troy, a seasoned expert in urban environmental management, explains for general readers how a city with a high "urban energy metabolism"—that is, a city that needs large amounts of energy in order to function. As global demand for energy grows and prices rise, a city's energy consumption becomes increasingly tied to its economic viability, warns the author of The Very Hungry City.

Sean rated it really liked it Apr 04, and the system of regional planning ensures that when it comes to energy, just about the only policy prescription we hear is about more domestic drilling. Overall, it was a useful read, which I will be keeping as a reference for its helpful analysis of issues of sustainability in urban planning. Living in the Landscape Richard Black.
