Having had every opportunity for five consecutive days and nights to inspect

The band was directed by William Sweeney, a cornet player who served as leader of the Cowboy Band from until He knows the worth and sturdiness of true Western character, and, as a lover of his country, wishes to present as many facts as possible to the public, so that those who will, can see actual pictures of life in the West, brought to the East for the inspection and education of the public.

One of the American papers describes this as the transference of a little bit of the terrible wars of the border which marked the early years of the Western settlements, the men signalled themselves by performing prodigies of valour, while the women, in their heroic courage and endurance, afforded a splendid example of devotion and self-sacrifice.
